

The Squall

John Walsh

Poetry

*A breath that stirs the leaves,
A rustle heard amidst the green,
A ghost that never grieves,

*Relief from sun's relentless glare,
It lifts the kite above the hill,
Suspends bright kites up in the air;
And tugs upon the string.*

*But darker clouds are massing now,
The sea has lost its silver gleam,
The yachts are urged to head for home,
Before the storm can intervene.*

*It comes — a shapeless fist of force
That shattered cliffs along the shore,
Destroyed without remorse,
Then raged and raged and roared.*

*The tortured trees now bend and shake,
The birds are tossed like scraps of cloud,
Then silence — just the robin's song,
To celebrate aloud.*
